Europe does not have a moral ground for condemning Russia for its war in Ukraine. The reason is that like Russia, it, too, likes conflicts. Throughout its history, whenever its countries were given a chance to fight a war, they left no stone unturned in waging it. As a result, millions of unarmed and innocent people died. For example, France's bloody war in Algeria claimed 1.5 million innocent lives between 1954 and 1962 (Abdul Sattar, 'Macron's vision', April 2023). Given all that, European countries must consider their past before issuing any statement pertaining to Russia's war in Ukraine.
