

TOPIC: Independence Leads to Interdependence

Social interactions are not the outcomes of individual's techniques and skills, but these are results of people's inner core. They can make good relations only if they are internally good besides their knowledge of skills. Moreover, if a person knows himself and has a self-respect, he is independent to tie his relations with others. Hence, interdependence is dependent on one's independence. If one acts only with skill, it is not universally acceptable.

Therefore, self-discipline which leads to independence is basically a real foundation of interdependence and good relations with others.
