

A Holiday Trip to Cherokee

The author was confused about a tourist destination when John called up and suggested a holiday trip to Cherokee. They visited a magnificent town of Cherokee called Qualla Boundary. Its craft, livelihood and historical masterpiece of music seemed to <sup>briefly</sup> sketch the past of Cherokee. Notwithstanding lingual hurdle, the natives directed them to a souvenirs shops. They were puzzled to meet George the shopkeeper as he spoke fluent English. George invited them for lunch where he told them how the locals sustained themselves by not relying on tourism only. The locals had tradition of entertainment industry which was very profitable. Finally, they stopped at Qualla's museum which boasted a range of objects and symbols of Cherokee cosmology. Back home, the writer looked forward to next such exotic trip.
