Impact of war on civilization

According to author, war has been the ultimate cause for the failure of civilization. War has left devastating impacts on its addicts that they found no way to escape until its perilous effects became evident. In the beginning the benefit of war might seem to be exceeded from its devastating effects in the form of economic and defense growth. Hazardous effects of the war rises, when the state reserves more energy and resources for military use rather to spend it on society growth. In the past, when this serious threat between war and civilization has been recognized, then steps have been taken to get rid of war in time to save society. In order, to gain peace each individual must have to perform his duty either by direct or indirect means. An individual refusal to war initiated by his state is a powerful stance against institution of war. In comparison, a collective strategy to resolve an international issue considered heroic. At last, author considered second option for more better choice.
