Q #06

Define, explain and contrast the politics of interest and the politics of conscience and how they influence policy making in Pakistan, including their relationship to the application of ethics. Be sure to include examples in your response, and discuss the difficulty in identification and applications of these influences within and between political parties?

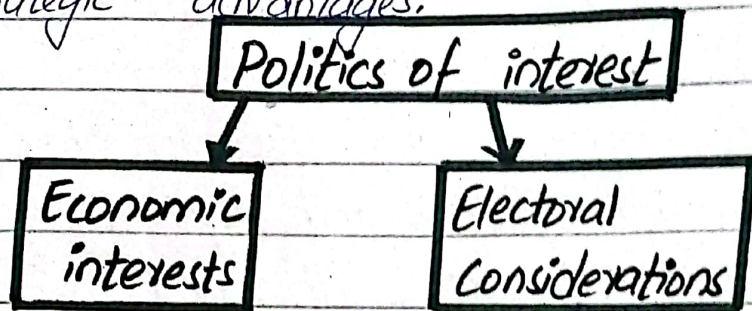

Introduction:

The politics of interest and the politics of conscience are two contrasting approaches to policy making that can be observed in political systems around the world, including in Pakistan. These approaches are rooted in different motivations and considerations that guide the decisions and actions of political actors. The relationship between these approaches and ethics adds another layer of complexity to policy-making process.

1- Politics of interests:

The politics of interest refers to the prioritization of policies and decisions that serve the self-interest of individuals, groups, or entities. This approach is often driven by the pursuit of economic gains, political power or strategic advantages.

i- Economic interests:

Policy decisions that cater to specific industries or economic sectors for personal or group financial gain can be considered politics of interest.

For instance, if a government promotes policies that favour a particular business group without considering broader economic implications, it falls within this category.

ii- Electoral Considerations:

Political parties might craft policies that appeal to their core voter base to ensure electoral support. For example, offering targeted subsidies or promising development projects to specific constituencies with the aim of securing votes can be seen as prioritizing political interest over broader ethical concerns.

Example:

During election campaigns, political parties in Pakistan often make promises such as providing free healthcare, education, or job opportunities in order to gain popular support, even if the feasibility of implementing such promises is questionable.

Theoretical perspective:

i- Rational choice Theory: This theory posits decisions on self-interest.

In Pakistan, parties and policymakers may prioritize policies for short-term gains, aiming to secure votes or power.

Example: Parties promise regional benefits during elections, favouring self-interest over economic viability for electoral support.

ii- Resource dependency Theory:

This theory highlights reliance on resources for goals. In politics, parties might ally with powerful groups for support. In Pakistan, business entities can sway policies via financial backing, leading to decisions favouring their interests, even if not in line with broader needs.

2. Politics of Conscience:

The politics of conscience emphasizes the ethical and moral aspects of policy-making, focusing on principles of justice, human rights and societal well-being. Policymakers guided by this approach seek to create policies that address broader societal issues and promote fairness and equity.

i- Human Rights:-

Policymakers who prioritize the politics of conscience might work towards policies that protect the right of marginalized groups, promote

Freedom of expression, and ensure equal treatment under the law, regardless of political expediency.

ii- Social Justice:

Policies that aim to reduce income inequality, alleviate poverty, and provide equal access to basic services fall within the realm of the politics of conscience. These policies might involve redistributive measures to address disparities.

Example:-

Efforts to reform labour laws in Pakistan to ensure fair wages, safe working conditions and the protection of workers' rights can be seen as policies driven by a conscience-driven approaches to address social justice.

Theoretical perspective:

i- Social Contract Theory: This theory proposes giving up freedoms for order and protection. In conscientious politics policymakers prioritize equitable resource distribution.

For example: they had work on policies reducing income inequality, providing vital services to all, aiming for a just society benefiting all.

ii- Rights - based Approaches- This approach safeguards marginalized rights. In conscientious politics, policies ensure equal access to service for all, disregarding. Example: labour law reforms ensure fair worker treatment, reflecting a rights-based stance regardless of social or economic status.

→ Influence on policy making in Pakistan:

i- Interplay of Ethics:-

The politics of conscience explicitly incorporates ethical considerations into decision-making. For instance, when debating the implementation of environmental regulations to safeguard natural resources, policy-makers have to weigh the long-term ethical responsibility against short-term economic interests.

ii- Difficulty in identification and Application:

a) Within Political parties:

Political parties in Pakistan often consist of diverse factions with varying priorities. Identifying whether a party leans towards interest or conscience can be challenging, as parties often blend policies of both motivations to appeal to a broader base.

b) Between political parties:-

Different political parties might adopt varying degrees of interest-based and conscience-driven policies. The competition between parties with differing priorities can result in contrasting policy proposals and ideological debates.

c) Changing priorities:

Parties may evolve their stances based on changing circumstances.

For instance: a party initially focused on interest-driven policies might pivot to conscience-driven approaches in response to public pressure or changing leadership.

Example:

Pakistan's Former governmental party (2018), which came up into power in 2018, campaigned on promises of anti-corruption efforts and governance reforms, suggesting a politics of conscience. However, its policies and actions during its tenure could be analyzed to identify instances where interest-driven decisions were made for political stability or economic growth.

Conclusion:

The politics of interest and politics of conscience provide lenses to analyze policy making motivation in Pakistan. The interplay of these motivations, often intertwined within political parties, shapes the complexity of policy decisions. The ethical considerations guiding these motivations determine whether policies prioritize short-term gains or long-term ethical values, contributing to the intricate tapestry of Pakistan's political landscape.

Religion as a form of ethical doctrine could potentially provide the "internal good" for development through its doctrines on social cohesion, mutual cooperation and virtue-based community.

Elaborate the following in this regards:

- a) Rule of law in the Islamic system
- b) Doctrine of the separation of powers and independence of Judiciary

Introduction:-

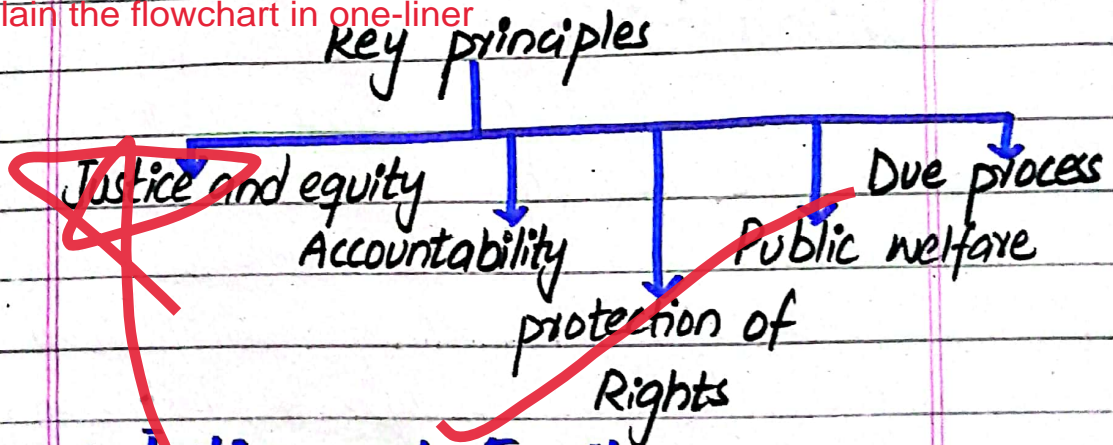

Religion has played a significant role throughout history in shaping societies, cultures, and ethical framework. It often provides a set of principles and values that guide individual behaviour, social interactions and community development. Islam contribute to the "internal good" of development through its doctrines on social cohesion, mutual cooperation, and virtue-based community, particularly focusing on the rule of law and the separation of power.

i- Rule of law in Islamic System:

The concept of the rule of law is fundamental to both Islamic jurisprudence and modern governance. In Islam, the rule of law is embedded in the idea that all individuals are equal before the law and that justice should be administered fairly and impartially. Key principles that support the rule of law with Islamic teachings include:

Explain the flowchart in one-liner

i- Justice and Equity:-

Islam places a high value on justice and equity. The Quran says, "O you who have believed, be persistently standing firm for Allah, witnesses in justice, and do not let the hatred of a people prevent you from being just. Be just; that is nearer to righteousness."

~ Quran

This verse emphasizes the importance of standing up for justice even in the face of personal biases or animosities.

ii- Accountability:

Islamic teachings emphasize accountability for all individuals, including leaders and rulers. The Prophet Muhammad (SAW) is reported to have said, "The imam (ruler) is a shield from behind whom the people fight and by whom they protect themselves." This highlights the responsibility of leaders to protect and serve the people and it implies that they are accountable for their actions.

iii- Protection of rights:-

Islamic principles protect the rights of the individuals. The Quran recognizes the sanctity of human life and property, stating, "And do not take the life which Allah has forbidden, except for a just cause." (~Quran)

This principle aligns with the rule of law and the protection of individual rights.

iv- Due processes:-

Islamic law upholds the principle of due processes. The Quran advises, "O you who have believed, when you go forth (to fight) in the cause of Allah, investigate; and do not say to one who gives you (a greeting of) peace, you are not a believer."

This emphasizes the need to investigate and ascertain the truth before passing judgement.

v- Public Welfare (Maslahah):-

Islamic Jurisprudence considers the welfare and well-being of society. Scholars often consider the concept of maslahah, or the greater good, when making legal decisions. This principle aligns with the modern development goals, as decisions are made with the goal of benefiting society as a whole.

Theoretical perspective:

Social Contract Theory, by thinkers, like Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau, posits that societies form through implicit agreements for protection and order. In Islam, justice, accountability, and rights align with this concept. Islamic rule of law reflects this, binding individuals and leaders to uphold justice and equity as part of the societal contract.

ii- Doctrine of separation of powers and independence of Judiciary:

While the formal separation of power as found in modern democratic systems may not be explicitly outlined in traditional Islamic text, there are principles within Islamic jurisprudence that align with the concept of checks and balances and the independence of the judiciary.

i- Shura (Consultation):

The concept of shura, or consultation, is deeply ingrained in Islamic governance. The Quran says, "And their affairs are (determined by) consultation among themselves."
(- Quran)

This encourage collective decision-making and reflect the ideas of involving different branches of government in decision processes.

2- Ijtihad (Independent Reasoning):

The doctrine of Ijtihad allows qualified scholars to interpret Islamic law based on changing circumstances. While not a direct parallel, this concept align with the idea of an independent judiciary that interprets laws in light of contemporary context, ensuring that justice is served.

3- Accountability of Rulers:-

Islamic teachings emphasizes the accountability of rulers. The Prophet Muhammad (SAW) is reported to have said, "Each of you is a shepherd and each of you is responsible for his flock." This signifies that leaders are responsible for the well being of their subjects and should govern justly.

4- Justice as a central principle:

The emphasis on justice in Islamic teachings underscore the need for the impartial decision making. The Quran states, "Do not let your hatred for a people incite you to act unjustly. Be just; that is nearest to righteousness". This aligns with the role of an independent judiciary in upholding justice.

Theoretical Perspectives:

Checks and Balances theory, from Enlightenment thinkers like Montesquieu, advocates dividing power among branches to avoid concentration. In Islam, principles like shura and ijtihad serve as early versions. Collective decisions and independent interpretation mirror the need for power balance and accountability.

Conclusion:-

Islamic ethical teachings provide a foundation for development's "internal good". Concepts like Rule of law, accountability, rights protection, due process, consultation, independent reasoning, and justice promotion foster cohesion, co-operation and virtuous communities. While not identical to modern concepts, they guide just societies in line with development goals, requiring adaptation to current contexts.
