

Education and Democracy

Some people would argue that democracy and literacy do not hold any relation but it is a flawed argument. The reality is democracy and illiteracy do not move together. Education is basic and compulsory for democracy. Studies shows, not only in present but also in past, it has always demanded enlightened and intellectual people. In today's world, it is hard to imagine that a democratic government can be governed without specialized educated people. A modern state can not be administered by outdated feudal mindset having no background in science, technology and social sciences. Besides, states having benighted people in their governments are facing plethora of issues in their economy, politics and society. On the contrary, states having enlightened people in their democratic setups are ruling the globe. Therefore, education is inevitable for democracy and no one can separate them.
