Title: Education and The Degree of Freedom.

Three schools of thought emerge, when it comes to freedom in education. It is due to the divergence of ideas of the objective of education and psychological theory. Some people believe that children should be totally independent and some believe that they should be properly controlled, both being irrespective of how bad and good they are. Most of the people consider that in spite of imparting freedom to children, they should be good but it is illogical and outdated. People having this stance consider education only a mean for personal development. In writer's opinion, this totally ignores the significance of education. It is idealistic to achieve necessary co-operation with individual incentive. There must be education to pass the minimum required knowledge. If every action is unrestrained then those who allow complete freedom would not be able to get success and without the moderation of their methods, their advantages would be ineffective. From social point of view, education must provide intellectual and moral growth along with personal development.
