The Need of Moral Education

(Q2) The training of man must concurrently instill in him intellect and kindness. Training individuals in this way has been a tedious task for the educational system. Previously, the domain of ethics and morality was only confined to religion and churches. But they failed to successfully accomplish this task, which is now evident in the collapse of traditional religious authority. The more realistic men, having power, have paid no attention to the problems of morality prevalent in society. They relate morality with power alone. Hence, it is vital that the education system possesses the dedication to inculcate empathetic values as an integral part of the learning process.
