Title: Humanity and the Law of Nature

People think that the law of nature is redundant because moralities vary over civilizations; however, the author denies it and supports minor difference in moralities. Because all civilizations admire warriors and criticize selfishness. When people deem the law of nature is a burden, they support morality. Hence, they conduct good and bad behavior accordingly. In bad temper, people express anger openly, but in good temper, people play down their emotions and limit them to themselves. (74/219)

Title: The Emerging middle Class in Pakistan

Despite poverty, disparity, and declining government progress, Pakistan has become a vigorous middle class economically. This class contains all professions, languages, and genders. They are both modernist and traditionalist. Fortunately, the youth among them have been influenced by orthodoxy. Moreover, consumerism is common among them, as all have full access to modern technological equipment. Indeed, this class has established a private polyclinic, and one-third of people have utilized it, as per a survey. (72/216)
