Introduction paragraph

Marshall McLuhan in his book "Understanding Media: Extensions of Man" states, "The medium is the message" and how the message of the medium is the change of scale or pace or pattern that it introduces into human affairs. It delineates how discourse and medium are intertwined and how the impact of the message is not central merely to the content but to how it is delivered. This phenomenon rightfully explains the revolution of the political world through a new medium of communication: social media. Social media has redefined the ways and means of the political system. It has led to openness and easy accessibility of political discourse, making it open to accountability and criticism. Social media, unlike traditional media, has provided space for and catered grievances of marginalized societies of the authoritarian states. The power and influence of social media in the form of public opinion has acted as a catalyst for political movements and activism. On the split side, it has led to misinformation and overproduction of political narratives resulting in simulation of reality. The captivating imagery and propaganda have given rise to populist regimes. This further worsened when state politics becomes subject to foreign involvement through social media. Therefore, social media has become a double-edged sword for the political world. Along with the numerous opportunities, it has also posed a myriad of challenges for political system. However, by ensuring a sound cyber policy and educating the masses states can prevent the growing challenges of social media.
