

1. Write a precis of the following passage and suggest a suitable title.

Throughout the ages of human development men have been subject to miseries of two kinds: those imposed by external nature, and, those that human beings misguidedly inflicted upon each other. At first, by far the worst evils were those that were due to the environment. Man was a rare species, whose survival was precarious. Without the agility of the monkey, without any coating of fur, he has difficulty in escaping from wild beasts, and in most parts of the world could not endure the winter's cold. He had only two biological advantages: the upright posture freed his hands, and intelligence enabled him to transmit experience. Gradually these two advantages gave him supremacy. The numbers of the human species increased beyond those of any other large mammals. But nature could still assert her power by means of flood and famine and pestilence and by exacting from the great majority of mankind incessant toil in the securing of daily bread. In our own day our bondage to external nature is fast diminishing, as a result of the growth of scientific intelligence. Famines and pestilence still occur, but we know better, year by year, what should be done to prevent them. Hard work is still necessary, but only because we are unwise: given peace and co-operation, we could subsist on a very moderate amount of toil. With existing technique, we can, whenever we choose to exercise wisdom, be free of many ancient forms of bondage to external nature. But the evils that men inflict upon each other have not diminished in the same degree. There are still wars, oppressions, and hideous cruelties, and greedy men still snatch wealth from those who are less skillful or less ruthless than themselves. Love of power still leads to vast tyrannies, or at mere obstruction when its grosser forms are impossible. And fear deep scarcely conscious fear -- is still the dominant motive in very many lives.

Precis: 1992

Title: Man's Attitude towards Adversities of Life

Men have been prone to the adversities of external nature and their pain inflicting nature since long. Man's existence was uncertain due to numerous environmental factors. In addition to this, the upright body posture and wisdom contributed to the superiority of man over other species. Moreover, nature demands continuous hard work and affirms its calamities. Nonetheless, with technological advancement, man has learned to cope up and halt natural disasters. Due to indolence, men rely on scientific ways to counter external threats. However, the affliction of man towards them still prevails. He tries to subjugate the weak. Therefore, power and fear dominate his life.

Follow the tense of the passage