PRÉCIS EXERCISE 12

The man, for instance, who, having wealth, is yet lacking in refinement of mind, who has no education by which he may understand and enjoy the beauties of literature, art and all-powerful. Any power he may have is the power of a brute which works for destruction rather edification. On the other hand is the man of trained intellect, the man whose soul has been open to the noble influences around him, who has treasured up not gold but a store of precious learning. He looks calmly upon the world around him, scorns its follies and despises its so-called pleasures. He has within himself a source of intellectual joy in contemplation of the mysteries and problems of the world and its history. He is the Man of Power before whom the Man of Gold must bow down in homage as to a king. Carlyle, in his study, living with his wife on an income of $100 per annum, but sending forth living words to stir the hearts of his countrymen, was more powerful than an American Millionaire, or any other whose money was used merely for perishable things of the world.

Unmatched power of Intellectual

The uneducated man of wealth, who cannot enjoy the pleasures of art, is not powerful. His wealth is only to be used for worldly pleasures. But an intellectual learned man is more powerful / exceeds in power, because he influences people and looks broadly to the World. He enjoys his intellectual activities and dislikes worldly pleasures. Thus, an intellectual surpasses untrained wealthy man in power because his writings remain alive and the wealth of a rich man perishes. 73
