

Social Problems of Former Colonies

In societies, cultures are divided into external and internal factors. Both of them are linked to a social structure. With modification of social structure, these aspects are also modified. Moreover, culture is also linked with socio-economic and political problems. The problems of undeveloped nations are larger as they originate from colonial era and old social structure. These countries are divided into feudal and tribal societies in which the former are developed and the latter are backward. These societies were subjugated till their independence and after that, only elite class was developed. With ethnic polarisation, the Colonialism further accelerated it resulting in vertical and horizontal division among tribal and national groups. This social structure still exists even after the independence of these countries.