The cold climate is suitable for humans in temperate countries and accelerates their energies.

Human nature responds differently: pessimist in extreme difficult situations, dysfunctional in absence of difficulty and operational when facing it courageously. Likewise, the intense cold and hot climates are also not beneficial. The moderate climate stimulates human energies by engaging them in tiring efforts to fulfil necessities of life like building houses, procuring clothes, managing wood for fire ignition and getting healthy food. In tropics, the humans don't need to put extra efforts for these essentials of life.

Human nature does not remain same in different climes. It also exhibits variations during different seasons of the year. Summer makes human life easy, while winter brings serious physical and mental exertions.
