

Role of Women in Development is Inevitable for developing States

Outline

1. Introduction

Thesis statement: Women comprise half of the world's population, and their role in development is inevitable for all the States, but patriarchal culture of developing States does not allow women to work side by side with men which hinders nation's growth. However, some pragmatic measures by government of the developing States can be helpful to ensure women's participation in all the sectors which will lead to the sustainable nation's development.

2. Women are key of sustainable human nation's development. amid the deluge of crisis.

3. Role of women in development is inevitable for developing States

a. To mitigate the curse of hunger

b. To ~~get~~ put off the States from the quagmire of economic crisis

c. Empowerment of the women is inevitable break the shackles of social taboos

d. Role of the women to control population growth rate.

e. Women's productive role to wage the war against climate change

f. Women's role in sustainable human development'

4. Policy recommendations to ensure women's participation in development

- Breaking idols of gendered education
- Mitigating the sinister of gendered division of labour
- Ensuring good governance for women's empowerment
- Protection of women for development of states.

5. Conclusion.

"No nation can reach to the height of glory unless your women are side by side with you".

Alau-d-din
This quotation of Alau-d-din highlights importance of women's role for development of any state. Women comprise half of the world's population and their role in development is inevitable for all states, but patriarchal culture of developing states hinders women to work side by side with men which hampers state's prosperity.

There is acute need to take some pragmatic measures by the government of all the states to ensure women's participation in every sector which will lead towards sustainable development. Women are the key of sustainable nation's development. Developing States are in the ambit of crisis.

People are growing with hunger and industries are desolated due to energy crisis. Inflation is increasing with rocket speed and an unbridled deluge of crisis has lashed out at human being owing to climate change.

In the ambit of crisis, women's role has become inevitable for all the States, specially for developing States. Women have potential to kill the parasite of hunger and food insecurity. Besides this, role of women in development can put the State out from quagmire of economic crisis. Moreover, women's empowerment is need of time to break social taboos that hinder nation's development. Over and above, women can play a vital role to control the population growth rate. Furthermore, women's role is inevitable in developing States to wage war against climate change. Along with these, women play a key role in sustainable human development. There are certain way through which women role in development can be ensured in developing states. First of all, gendered education system should be discouraged and equal educational opportunities should be given to all. Besides this, steps should be taken by the states and individual level to mitigate sinister of gendered labour division. Moreover, governance should be good to ensure women's role in development. Last but not the least, states should ensure security to encourage women to participate in nation's development. These measures will help to bring women in development in developing states which will lead towards peace and prosperity.

Globe is cluttered by unbridled crisis owing to a number of reasons. There is violent shift of the world order which has opened the doors of destructions for whole world. Climate change has brought a wave of uncontrollable destruction. All these sinister are being detected in more horrendously in developing states. Developing states are facing the havoc caused by west and industrialist states. In such fragile moments,

There is acute need to ensure women's participation in every sector of the developing states. Women are the key of sustainable human development for any state. Women have the potential to turn the tides of crisis. Developing states do not let women to empower and to work side by side with men owing to conservative mindset. Most of the developing states have patriarchal culture where women are considered a mean of reproduction and a creature to serve men. The confinement and illiteracy of half of population add fuel to fire of crisis in developing states. Their economy is affected more horrendously with each blow back to global economy. Developed states, on the other hand, allow women to participate in development with productive role of whole population, they overcome all crisis splendidly, but this is an unfulfilled dream in developing state. They have women empowerment owing to patriarchy and theocracy. Women are key of state's development, but they themselves remain confined owing to social taboos. There is need to allow them to participate in development process of developing states to get them out from the quagmire of crisis.

women's role in development is inevitable for developing states to put them out from the swamp of hunger. Developing states are suffering with acute hunger crisis due to a number of recent events in the world.

These crisis are being surmounting productivity of people in developing states. Women have potential to curb the curse of food insecurity as per Food and Agriculture organization, more than 43% of global agriculture labour force is comprised by women, but they are not given equal resources, like transport, land's ownership, energy, seeds, fertilizer or access to market.

This affects their productivity in agriculture sector. According to United Nations, if women had equal agricultural resources as men had, this could increase agriculture production to (4.1%) four percent. So, women are needed to be empowered in developing states to mitigate hunger crisis.

Besides this, women's role in development is important to put the job of developing states from the perspective of economic crisis. Women comprise half of the world population. If they are not allowed to work and contribute in economic development, they would become a burden on state's treasury and natural resources. If they are allowed to participate in economic growth, states develop with rocket speed. For example, China give full freedom and protection to women to work in factories and other sectors. China is the second largest economy owing to its productive nation. On the other hand, theocracy in Pakistan hinders women to work side by side with men as stated in "Women in development" by Chitra Kellogg. So, women should be given equal opportunities to overcome economic crisis in developing states.

Along with these, women empowerment is much need in developing states to break the shackles of social labours which hinders the state to develop. Developing states usually remain in the ambit of bleak social factors which next want to play their productive role in states development. Reluctantly, development of the state is compromised. For example, women are not allowed to go out and to work with men in the patriarchal society. They are considered as creature to be subjugated by men as stated by Seniya Burey in Custom or Crime. Violence against women in Pakistan. Moreover, division of labour is gendered. Women are supposed to stay at home and to serve their men. They are not allowed to get education, especially in remote areas, as has depicted in a drama serial, Mary Humnasheen, in which a girl had to fight for her right to education. This hampers development of state. So, women empowerment is important to break social factors and to put the state on the road of development. Moreover, women play a very important role role to control population growth rate in developing states, but this is possible only through women's empowerment. When women are economically strong, they are able to plan their family. Otherwise, they have to bear their needs knee in the front of their men who consider women as created to produce and brought up children. For example, women in west are empowered. They have full control on their body. They are allowed to decide when and how much children they want. Contrarily, women in Pakistan are dependent on their husbands. For example, a man in Quetta, Jan Muhammad, is father of sixty children. This shows result of illiteracy of women, and their dependency on men lead to high population growth rate. So, women should be empowered to control population growth in developing states.

Furthermore, women have great role to urge the war against climate strategies in the whole world, but specially in developing states because they are more vulnerable to Climate Change. Women can increase capacity of state to wage the war against nature's ravage. They can take a lead role to counter climate changes. For example, women in Bangladesh have developed a wind and flood resilient housing foundation for their community. Similarly, women in Sudan formed first women's farmer union to improve food security in their community if women in developing states are acquainted with the climate education, they can play a productive role to reduce hazards of climate change. Along with this, they can teach next generation the complexities of climate change so, women can play a vital role to deal with hazards of climate change in developing states.

Over and above, women are the backbone of sustainable human development which leads towards sustainable economic growth.

Women raise generations and future of nations. The way women brought up their children leads a state towards devastation or development.

For example, women in Switzerland are educated and well-nutritienced. So, they raise an educated and healthy generation with high productivity. On the other hand, women in Pakistan, a developing state, are malnurtienced.

According to the World Bank, forty eight percent of Pakistan's population is under-nutritienced. This has direct impact on the economic development of state. As when she mother will be healthy, she will raise her childer in effective way. Those will play vital role in country's development. So, women's health and empowerment is important for sustainable human development which leads towards economic prosperity.

There are a number of the ways through which women's participation in development can be ensured in developing state. First of all, there is dire need to break the idols of gender education. Gendered education is a havoc which proliferates the gender inequality. There is small room for girls to compere to boys in gendered education

System of gendered education which stall women's empowerment and State's development. Developing States are in the system which stall women's empowerment and State's development. For example, Afghanistan has banned women to acquire university level education. In Pakistan, a developing and misfortunate state, women are deprived from right to education in multiple areas, especially in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa and Waziristan. This marginalised educational system suppose boys to be a doctor or engineer, and girls to be a house wife. Thus, there is dire need to get rid from this gendered educational system to bring prosperity in developing states.

Besides this, gendered division of labour should be discouraged. Gendered division of labour halt women's empowerment and add fuel to the fire of State's crisis. Gender socialization and inequality is stamped by gendered role and division of labour. For example, boys are supposed to go out to work and to earn livelihood for his family. On the other hand, women are assigned with the task to take care that children and to serve their husbands.

This gendered labour division in factories or offices. They have to face harassment assassination if they raise to compete the men in any sector.

For example, "Fatima Jinnah" faced character assassination during election campaign in 1965's election, Pakistan at the helm, Tikka Deveshwar. So, the curse of gendered division of labour should be curbed to give equal opportunities to women which will lead towards socio-economic prosperity in developing states.

Moreover, good governance should be ensured to empower women in developing states. Women will be able to play a vital role in state's development if there is good governance. Good governance is a key of women's empowerment. There are a number of the laws which have been passed at different times in Pakistan to secure women's right. For example, bill of inheritance was passed in 2010 but even today, only forty percent women enjoy their part in inheritance. There is another law, Acid Control Act, which was passed in 2010 to protect women from acid attack, but still they are prone to such heinous attacks. For example, two sisters in Kozhikode were thrown acid for refusing marriage proposal in december, 2022. According to law, minimum age for marriage is 18 years, but still child marriages take place. This is due to poor governance and feeble implementation of these laws. So, good governance should be ensured to empower women in developing States.

Role of women is inevitable in development of any state. "They have potential to give more promising outputs as compare to men", world Economic forum. They worked as a reserved army in industries during world war I and world war II. They played vital role in civil rights war. This shows that they are no inferior to men. Women have been deprived from basic rights in developing states. There is patriarchal culture which hinder women to be empowered. Today, world is cry of hoarsing in the ambit of crisis. There are energy and food crisis throughout the globe. Developed nations have potential to wage with entheropogenic and natural calamities in splendid way with minimum loss owing to the women empowerment in these states. Women work and contribute in economic development of the developed states as they are given equal right and opportunities. On the other hands, developing states are lacking due to hunger crisis and energy shortage. Global inflation has fueled the fire and aggravated the situation in developing states. These states are more vulnerable to climate change. In this increasing time, women role in development in developing states has become a dire need of the hours. They should be given equal opportunities to Showcase their potential to contribute in development of the state.

Developing states should take some measures with true spirit on immediate base to ensure women participation in state's development.
Women can take a leading role to bring prosperity in states by delecting the man-made and natural calamities.
Developing states should ensure women's empowerment for state's prosperity; otherwise, they will be plunged in the blood of unbridled crisis.