The author had difficulties to choose a place for tea. Fred his friend suggested Cherokee, a country and visited Oklahoma. They got ready and visited to Galla boundary which is very beautiful. It presents brief image of Cherokee to the tourist. They went to shop where they met with a middle age person, George. He invited them for lunch and discuss about his 'clay fountain'. He was wood cutter before shopkeeper. After discussion with George they realized that the people of Cherokee did not merely depend merely on trade. They did other activities for income as well, such as "Bingo weekend" where a large hall opened to attract people for different games. Then they visited a museum which is full of different arts. They came back to home and missed Cherokee very much.
