- Martin Luther: I have a dream... (Preis)
- One day everyone will promote Brotherhood

One day, according to Martin Luther, every person will emerge and live their faith freely. He dreamed that all the slaves and their owners will be united. There will be no oppression and ethnic divide. No one will be criticized and judged on their skin color. There will be no superiority of white and black. Everyone will hold each other hands and promote the message of equality. He hoped that God will shower His mercy on His people and remove all the inequalities. Also, he dreamed to return his home with a ~~hop~~ faith that all the miseries will be diminished and a beautiful message of brotherhood will be spread.

Art's a commodity for Business Patrons

Art becomes a business venture in wealthy societies. Elites support art to increase their reputations despite their weak understanding about it. Museums also use art as a commodity to raise their market value. This trend accelerated during Japanese bubble economy, when an indebted person bought a van Gogh's painting to save his family from heavy taxes imposed by government. Despite ethical standing of art, it will continuously transform into a great business. Only wealthy people can support art and can open expensive museums. Hence, regardless of art's commodification, it helps in redistribution of wealth among elites.
