Essay

In these turbulent times, most Pakistanis think that financial instability is the biggest problem facing Pakistan. With this in mind, they keep up close eye on finance minister and his team. Few, however, have been able to read between the lines and conclude that poor governance undercuts the financial woes and many other problems of Pakistan. On closer look, it becomes as clear as day that myriad problems are responsible for bad governance. Chief among them are political fray, economic difficulties, and corruption. Years of bad governance have made delivery of public services and human developments iffy and sketchy. The resultant erosion of public trust has also undermined democratization. Therefore, it has become indispensable to turn the tables on good governance, and principles of good governance can just do that. Summing up, crisis of good governance, stemming from political conflict, economic instability, and corruption, among other things, has deteriorated public service delivery and human development in Pakistan. The cure of this malaise through adoption of good governance has, therefore, become urgent and imperative.
