Title: The Relation of war and Civilizations

The writer concluded war as an ultimate cause of breaking down any civilization. The war happens when its participants are unable to resist it despite the deadliest expected outcomes - Civilizations, in their initial growth phase; find the war beneficial for enhancing power and finances dominating the sufferings. This led states to war over small triggers.

The cancerous nature of war become aparent with advancement in economic and man-power resources by the state that proves deadliest for victim, unless he can retaliate.

Historically, such relationship of civilization and war was avoided by providing alternative scenarios to save the states.

The significant role in that was of individuals - They either individually or with their states, collectively can resist any violent actions by avoiding any triggers -

Author finds the collective state effort fruitful in avoiding war -
