

Indent the paragraph.
Children And freedom in education

The author asserts that there are three schools of thought on freedom in education, one "set free children however bad," two "control children however good" and three "who expect them to be good while setting them free". people with this mindset view education as merely a way to development than serving a higher purpose. children will not learn morality if left completely free. In order to gain their co-operation, we need to be co-operative too. Trained educators' labour could go in vain if they are neither strict nor lenient according to circumstances. Education not only offers growth but also teaches morality and virtuousness which children cannot learn by themselves only.

Idea is generally ok. First sentence needs to be written again. Punctuation and capitalization mistakes.
