It is a general perception that there is a conflict between laws of state and freedom of citizen. It seems not wrong. Every law imposes certain restriction on citizens. The more the laws, the more will be the restrictions. Owing to numerous restrictions, freedom of citizens is compromised. However, the fewer the laws, the more will be the freedom.

In order to find our hidden flaws, it is important to consider what our enemies think of us. Our friends usually flatter us. Either they do not take our flaws seriously, or they do not want to hurt our sentiment, or they simply turn a blind eye. In contrast, our enemy critically observes us and find our flaws from every aspect. Consequently, he makes a mountain out of a molehill. However, there is some reality in it. A friend always highlights the virtues, where as an enemy, vices. Therefore, we should be more grateful to our enemy because he makes us aware of our flaws. In this context, an enemy seems better than a friend.
