

Martin Luther King had dreamed that one day this nation would realize its true worth. There would be equality everywhere. All the differences among slaves and free would be vanished. Hatred would be transformed into affection. Character would serve as basis of opinion formation. The discriminatory attitude of government against blacks would turn into feeling of compassion. Every dispute would be ended. He wanted to return to south with this belief. This faith served as a ray of hope for him. This faith had potential to convert disagreement among nation into concurrence. This faith could prepare them to endure all hardships together.
