Title = Different schools of thought on freedom ⁱⁿ education - precis:-

The author highlights the three prevalent perspectives on freedom in education. The first group advocates complete freedom for children whatever their behaviour. The second group believes in absolute authority, regardless of child behavior. However, the third group believes in freedom, but with expectation of moral perfection, which is not supported by observations of animals and babies. He argues that education, from a social perspective should provide opportunities for growth and development, including mental and moral development, which can't be achieved solely by children on their own. He agrees with the third group, which is too individualistic and neglects the importance of knowledge.
