-> On the question of Freedom in education there are at present three main schools of thought, deriving partly from difference as to ends and partly from difference in psychological theory. There are those who say that children should be completely free, however bad they may be; there are those who say they should be completely subject to authority, however good they may be; and there are those who say they should be free, but in spite of freedom they should be always good. This last party is larger than it has any logical right to be; children, like adults, will not all be virtuous if they are free. The belief that liberty will ensure moral perfection is a relic of Rousseauism, and would not survive a study of animal and babies. Those who hold this belief, that think that education should have no positive purpose, but should merely offer an environment suitable for spontaneous development, I cannot agree with this school, which seems to me too individualistic, and utterly indifferent to the importance of knowledge. We live in communities which require co-operation, and it would be utopian to expect all the necessary co-operation to result from spontaneous impulse. The existence of a large population in a limited area is only possible owing to science and technique; education must, therefore, hand on the necessary minimum of these. The educators who allow most freedom are men whose success depends upon a degree of benevolence, self-control, and trained intelligence, which can hardly be generated when every impulse is left unchecked; their merit, therefore, are not likely to be perpetuated if their methods are untried. Education, viewed from a social standpoint, must be something more positive than a mere opportunity for growth. It must, of course, provide child, but it must also provide a mental and moral equipment which children cannot acquire entirely for themselves.
