

Titles

1. Impact of climate on human beings
2. De-motivating impact of extreme weathers
3. Moderate climate, best for human activity

CSS 2019

I think modern educational theorists are inclined to attach too much importance to the negative virtue of not interfering with children, and too little to the positive merit of enjoying their company. (If you have the sort of liking for children that many people have for horses or dogs, they will be apt to respond to your suggestions, and to accept prohibitions, perhaps with some good-humoured grumbling, but without resentment.) It is no use to have the sort of liking that consists in regarding them as a field for valuable social endeavour, or what amounts to the same thing as an outlet for power-impulses. No child will be grateful for an interest in him that springs from the thought that he will have a vote to be secured for your party or a body to be sacrificed to king and country. The desirable sort of interest is that which consists in spontaneous pleasure in the presence of children, without any ulterior purpose. Teachers who have this quality will seldom need to interfere with children's freedom, but will be able to do so, when necessary, without causing psychological damage.

Unfortunately, it is utterly impossible for over-worked teachers to preserve an instinctive liking for children; they are bound to come to feel towards them as the proverbial confectioner's apprentice does towards macaroons. I do not think that education ought to be anyone's whole profession: it should be undertaken for at most two hours a day by people whose remaining hours are spent away from children. The society of the young is fatiguing, especially when strict discipline is avoided. Fatigue, in the end, produces irritation, which is likely to express itself somehow, whatever theories the harassed teacher may have taught himself or herself to believe. The necessary friendliness cannot be preserved by self-control alone. But where it exists, it should be unnecessary to have rules in advance as to how "naughty" children are to be treated, since impulse is likely to lead to the right decision, and almost any decision will be right if the child feels that you like him. No rules, however wise, are a substitute for affection and tact.

(360 words)

120

The way of children liking

Modern educationists are more interested in non-interference and less towards gathering enjoyment of children. Love with children results good bond and advice. However, it must not pave the way for social fragility or power-motiv. The future consideration for the support of the country is an unreal pleasure while, real pleasure lies in children's present. Teachers possessing such qualities value necessary interference with mental treatment. But, unfortunately, over-busy teachers lack this connectivity and presence mere a professional representation. In fact, education is just not a profession, but it should be people's attempt of children liking. Because lack of educational discipline causes societal irritation. Therefore, advanced rules will treat children better only when affection with children becomes realistic.

Words in a passage: 360

Words written in pieces: 120

Mistakes identified. One idea missed.