

It is a public opinion that the law of country and the freedom of an individual are opposite to each other. Apparently, this statement does not seem wrong. Every law imposes some limitation on the citizens. If a country has a great number of laws, then the collective limitations are also plentiful. The freedom of an individual is buried under the burden of increasing limitations. In contrast, if the number of laws are less then the circle of freedom of citizens widens.