Title: Freedom in Education

There are three schools of thought on freedom in education. The largest party supports Rousseauism which states that freedom in education is necessary for the children to be upright. The proponents of this view also believe education to be a mere source of growth. They do not believe in purposive education. The author rejects this view by declaring it illogical. To him, absolute freedom can never generate qualities like self-control, cooperation, benevolence and trained intelligence which are vital in our societies. According to him, education should be purposive along with personal growth. It should be a source of moral and mental training.
