

▪ Sample 3

To know one's own business and to mind nothing else, that is the way to carry on the work of life. This sounds like a common saying, yet few really acknowledge it, even in principle, it is not often that even the first step-that of knowing what one's business is-is honestly taken; it must be allowed that with many there are intellectual as well as moral difficulties in the way of this first step. The easier method of getting rid of the intellectual difficulty for a man is to ask himself what is not his business; and many a kindly person may be surprised to find that he has been in the habit of considering it a virtue to waste time, thought, feeling, and other means of interests which truly are no business of his at all. He may have to confess that he has been constantly wasting sympathy on sorrows and evils which he cannot remove or alleviate. Sympathy which does not mean action of some sort is not much of a virtue in any man; while in those human beings who habitually indulge in sympathy for its own sake, it is apt to become a hateful and vicious cowardice.

Title:- To Know and Mind Own Business

To know and mind one's own business, a famous adage, is mostly unvalued. In fact, many people are unable to perform the first step of knowing their own business because of moral and logical reasons. They are used to of wasting their time, feelings, and other means on empathizing on unrelated problems, considering it to be moral. For such people, it is better to be unkind and careless.
