Self-Respect: A Key to Success

According to Besant, the middle class of 19th century were not even considered the part of society irrespective of their profession, except nobility. They were like an uninvited guests in society which inculcated within them the sense of self-respect and the need of their own society. Due to this self-respect and self-importance, their life started to change. Other factors such as increase in size and influence also contributed to changing dimension of their life. They adopted the idea of self-importance from the qualitative and thankful lifestyle of poor, rather than rich. (90 words).

Realization of Nature After its Destruction

Due to different nature of perception, the early Greeks did not portray their genius and landscapes to the world. Although Greece was rich in natural and eye-catching landscapes, but still they ^{did not} include them in their art. This was because of their fear and dislike for these landscapes. They feared these sites because of their ability to hide threat within them. These threats could be from mankind, wild animals or natural disasters. Along with fear, they also disliked these landscapes because the abundance of mountains and forests caused hindrance in agriculture and human interaction. Due to lack of agricultural and natural habitats, the Greek art in those days was struggling with material nature. The Greeks did not feel any surge urge to change their lifestyle until the emergence of imperialism that bring urban revolution. This urbanization filled the nature with dust, smoke, and noise. After which the importance, colour and sound of nature was realized and represented by Greek authors of that time. (163 words)
