

Title: "Learning in a conducive Environment"
 Modern education theorists focus more on the negative aspects of interfering with children rather than the positive picture of enjoying their company. The innate liking for children makes them ~~to~~ respond to suggestions and accept the rules without showing displeasure. Children do not usually welcome the sort of liking to use them for any purpose. They appreciate the interests ~~without having any~~ with no ultimate purpose. Teachers having this quality are able to engage with children without causing any psychological damage.

Overworked teachers are unable to have instinctive liking for children as they feel restricted. Education ~~should~~ rather than being a profession should be adopted by those who mostly spend time away from children. Exhausted teachers usually cause irritation among the children. It is only in the environment of friendliness that children feel every decision to be right. Rules are never an alternate for affection.
