

Title: Social Roots of Cultural Problems

Culture has two dimensions. The outer dimension manifests the inner ideological dimension. Both of these are a part of a social structure. Culture changes with a change in social structure. Hence, cultural problems of developing countries need to be evaluated with respect to their social issues. Developing countries face the problem of stagnant development. This is due to their colonial past and an outdated social structure. These countries were divided into feudal and tribal societies. The feudal societies had a refined culture but were few in numbers. The tribal societies had a crude culture and were more common. Both these societies were in constant conflict with each other. The colonialists contributed to increasing this division between the societies. Therefore, the development of these societies had been restricted until they got independence.
