

Q. 2. Write a précis of the following passage and also suggest a suitable title:

being first attempt this precise is well composed well done

I think modern educational theorists are inclined to attach too much importance to the negative virtue of not interfering with children, and too little to the positive merit of enjoying their company. If you have the sort of liking for children that many people have for horses or dogs, they will be apt to respond to your suggestions, and to accept prohibitions, perhaps with some good-humoured grumbling, but without resentment. It is no use to have the sort of liking that consists in regarding them as a field for valuable social endeavour, or what amounts to the same thing as an outlet for power-impulses. No child will be grateful for an interest in him that springs from the thought that he will have a vote to be secured for your party or a body to be sacrificed to king and country. The desirable sort of interest is that which consists in spontaneous pleasure in the presence of children, without any ulterior purpose. Teachers who have this quality will seldom need to interfere with children's freedom, but will be able to do so, when necessary, without causing psychological damage. Unfortunately, it is utterly impossible for over-worked teachers to preserve an instinctive liking for children; they are bound to come to feel towards them as the proverbial confectioner's apprentice does towards macaroons. I do not think that education ought to be anyone's whole profession: it should be undertaken for at most two hours a day by people whose remaining hours are spent away from children. The society of the young is fatiguing, especially when strict discipline is avoided. Fatigue, in the end, produces irritation, which is likely to express itself somehow, whatever theories the harassed teacher may have taught himself or herself to believe. The necessary friendliness cannot be preserved by self-control alone. But where it exists, it should be unnecessary to have rules in advance as to how "naughty" children are to be treated, since impulse is likely to lead to the right decision, and almost any decision will be right if the child feels that you like him. No rules, however wise, are a substitute for affection and tact.

Children Need Affectionate Behavior

The Author thinks that the modern educationists are ~~more likely to~~ avoid interaction with children rather than to be entertained by them. If there is unconditional love for children, they will behave positively in return. The child will not be thankful to that interest which have any societal aim, only the involuntary and undivided attention will be beneficial. The teachers of this calibre will need to spend some quality time with children but it is unfeasible for over-burdened teachers. The educationists who have no interaction with children, should spend maximum two hours with them. When the group of children is not controlled strictly, they cause tiredness and annoyance. In this situation, the children should be handled according to the need rather than applying planned set of rules. However, fondness is the key to control them effectively.

Total words count : 366 words in précis : 135

main idea is picked and discussed be precise and to the point
no need to use extra words over all precise is satisfactory