

Envy and admiration: Two extremes of Human Nature

Envy is the Achilles heel in the human nature. It is ~~not~~ <sup>not only</sup> ~~only~~ pernicious for the envious person himself but also ~~to~~ <sup>for</sup> the others. Instead of being grateful for what he has, an envious man becomes jealous <sup>of</sup> about others' <sup>others'</sup> achievements and possessions. If envy remained unchecked, ~~and~~ it would be disastrous for the society. However, admiration in human nature <sup>enables</sup> ~~makes~~ one to accept <sup>others</sup> accomplishments.

Ultimately, it engenders happiness and lessens envy. In short, admiration and happiness go hand <sup>in</sup> hand. Although <sup>happiness</sup> can be an antidote for envy, the latter <sup>lets</sup> never let a person to be jealous. So, envy can only be rehabilitated by comprehending the reasons behind <sup>envious</sup> feelings.

Use "In short" for last sentence only. Structural mistakes found. Avoid cutting. Idea is ok.