Précis Title: Ideal Way of Dealing with Children

Modern educationists, according to the author, wrongly argue not to be engaged with children rather than enjoying their company. Children in fact respond positively to every instruction without ~~rejection~~ objection if they sense being loved unconditionally. On the contrary, if anyone tends to implant in them a social sense to have some expectations from them in future, they never cooperate positively and the only reasonable act is to feel joy in their company unconditionally. Any teacher with such a quality would enjoy more in their company without causing mental disturbance. The author opines that teaching as a profession should only be undertaken part time as spending the entire day with children restricts overburdened teachers from developing a liking for them. Undisciplined children generate feelings of irritability due to fatigue experienced by teachers who are ~~home~~ pestered by children. If a friendly nature exists between them, it is better to act on the spot in dealing with mischievous children rather than envisaging a strategy beforehand as instructions can never replace love.
