There are million and one ways to destroy a country and its determination during a war, most easiest of which centres around primary education. With more than 1300 schools totally destroyed in the government-held provinces in Ukraine as a result of an ongoing war, shrill alarm bells surrounding the prospects of education and normalcy in the conflict-ravaged terrain are almost ubiquitous across the Western world.

Latest to register its reservations, the UN Agency for Children emphasised, "Not only has this left Ukraine's children struggling to progress in their education, but they are also struggling to retain what they learnt when their schools were fully functioning." No qualms about the scale of damage to at least 3,6 million children imperilled by losing critical years of schooling and social development.

Since education cannot be put on hold, humanitarian organisations like UNICEF have been working with the government and other partners to rehabilitate bomb shelters in kindergartens and schools providing them with laptops and other supplies on top of tools to ensure psycho-social support. Informal learning opportunities are

...early gaining momentum in a bid to ensure childhood and its related hopes for a better tomorrow are not last. How mighty noble of the developed world to realise the needs of the vulnerable even when the situation was becoming downright chaotic! →

Sadly for the rest of us, this magnanimity is not able to push through the obstacles when similar conflicts appear in other parts of the world. A conflict that had begun in mid-April has pushed Sudan's faltering education system into a state of collapse.

Schools shut down or repurposed into group homes and most end-of-year exams cancelled, Sudan's war has no end in sight but no many in the international community have yet paid any attention to similar distress signals sent out by the likes of the UN. While meagre efforts continue, they speak volumes about an overall apathy to those who do not look like us or speak the same language. *

Relief efforts:

A country could be destroyed through many ways but destroying their basic education is easiest one. Ongoing rivalry in Ukraine has destroyed more than 13000 schools in government-held provinces but still through out the western world, normalisation of education in affected regions bells ~~at~~ at high volume. UN agency for children has said that affected children ~~hard~~ struggle hard not only to attain education but also to retain what they had got taught before. Before organisations along with the government struggle to ensure the establishment of bomb-proof shelters and provision of laptops to facilitate and relax ~~the~~ children. To continue proper children education and better future, the hopes still exist. Upper class of the world took efforts in their unfavourable conditions but sad to say that their efforts can't be helpful if other parts of the world faces this situation. Like as happening in Sudan, whose shaken education even got ~~is~~ pressed and the war goes on. No one paid attention to it and even UN shown favoritism.
