Introduction

Human beings are born free with the innate right to liberty, which include the right to express one's opinion, speech and expression. This right, commonly referred to as the freedom ^{of expression} ~~to express~~, allows individuals to express their ^{view} ~~opinion~~ on any subject and allow others ^{to do same} ~~to do the same~~. It is of paramount importance, as progress and improvement cannot be achieved without the right to disagree. Consequently, it is of great importance in the social, political and scientific spheres of human life. For instance, in the ^{sp} beginning of the 15th century, the German reformer Martin Luther used his freedom of speech to bring his 95 objections against the Roman church, which laid the foundation for the formation of ~~the~~ Protestant Revolution. In the scientific world, the freedom to disagree has led to numerous discoveries and the development of laws based on scientific method.

This right to disagree is not only widespread in many areas of human life, but it is also reinforced by the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, which gives it strength on a global level. On the other hand, lack of this freedom has resulted in the loss of humanity's intellectuals such as Socrates, the founder of western philosophy.

In point of fact, the right to express opinion is a fundamental element of a peaceful life. Its absence can have devastating effect on society. However, it has significant impact in the social, political and scientific world, but if unchecked it could lead to irreparable harm.
