Middle Class of the 19th Century

Middle class of the 19th century was treated like they did not belong to society. Only persons of high class were well-fit in the society at that time.

They were neither welcomed in the country nor in the town.

So, they made their own society and lived there with dignity. With time, they multiplied and their respect for their importance and values also increased. They set their values as standard for the lower orders. They all were respectable.

However, standards of being respectable were subjective. Still there wa

e.g., dru gence e respect

there was unanimity in some views e.g., drunker behaviours, self-indulgence etc were not considered respectable.
