Preservation of Man's Property in a Society

According to John Lock, men chose to live in a society for legal preservation of their property. Power of society is bounded to welfare of its people. Only laws can define this welfare. These laws necessarily be administered by honest judges to recognize the main concern of people that no power can take the property of a man forcefully. Man's property is for his own use. As a result, he says taxes must be imposed with their willingness.
