|| Theoretical Perspectives ||

Classical School of Thought

According to the classical school of thought, - "Ceasre Bonesana" - people commit crime out of their free will, the deterrence of severe punishment is the only way to contain crime. Moreover, Jeremy Bentham said, the criminal weigh the both crime and pleasure; if the pain against the crime is more than the pleasure, the will not materialize, but if the pleasure of the crime is more than the pain the person will commit crime.

→ Every person is inclined towards pleasure, such natural phenomenon is termed as "Psychological Hedonism".

Labeling Theory

As per this theory, a person become what its society label him. If a person in their small age (Juvenile) commit any crime then the society, peer groups or family label him with their crime even after years. This label lead him towards criminal activity.

→ In second case, if a person belongs to the criminal background, the society label them with their wrongful acts. Moreover, their new generation would also be label with those sarcastic names. Laterly, the label make them criminals in real sense.

Learning Theory

- According to this theory, Human are social being; they interacts with other people, and more like to stay in touch with people of same status.
- Person learn from their circle of influence. The smaller the circle is, the more influence exerts on person.
- If one sits among criminals, smugglers drug deals they will become the one of them.
