INTRODUCTION:

Malala Yousafzai, a Pakistani activist, defied the Taliban's ban on girls' education, inspiring a global movement. Her bravery demonstrates the transformative impact women can have on a nation's security and stability. By empowering women and girls, communities can reduce the appeal of extremist ideologies and promote sustainable peace. Malala's story is a powerful reminder for nations today to involve women in the stability of the nation. Their impact can protect peace, security, long-lasting governance, trust and the stability of our nations because they are powerful actors of peacemaking, peacekeeping, Economic development, moderating extremism. Also very good at dialogue and building trust, bridge divide. Women can often perform better than men in academics as well. Additionally, Women in councils can also help go governments last longer. This can only be achieved by empowering and encouraging them promoting education and providing them with equal opportunities. They should be given equal chances as men in the development of their countries. Their efforts can strengthen a nation's security and stability because they have the power to build trust among communities and provide the strength to face hardships.
