

(Title with Marker)
Directionless Dissipation of Human Energies

The evils of today's world are attributed to the directionless dissipation of human energies. The world is in a chaos and author blames the ill-directed human activities for it, not the human indolence.

For instance, if a passive approach and suppression of energies were adopted during major political events of history, the present could have been much peaceful and pleasant. But, humans rather conformed to their belief that there should always be some activity and <sup>no</sup> time should be wasted. The result of this belief is the situation we observe in our world at present. Even today, if the political leaders could <sup>change</sup> their perception that laziness is a crime, and take a break from their continuous activity, it will be fruitful. Such an approach will foster relaxed thinking which can direct our political and religious leaders <sup>attend to</sup> the most pressing issues of time.

original words - 435

Precis words = 144 (146)