The author says that modern theorists emphasize more on non-interference with children, rather than focusing on positive aspect of enjoying their company. Children should not be liked for any hidden objective, but for getting instant pleasure by their presence. Hence, teachers with this quality would rarely interfere with their freedom, even if they do, it would not cause psychological damage. However, overworked teachers cannot have such instinct for children and they might get irritated as well.

The author believes the profession should be undertaken for two hours only, by people whose remaining hours are spent without children. Therefore, there is no need to have prior ~~for~~ rules for dealing with different types of children, as spontaneous actions would produce the best result.
