(C) Conclusion:

Imagine a society where every individual has equal access to quality education, healthcare, and employment opportunities, regardless of their background or socio-economic status. In this society, laws are enforced fairly, resources are distributed equitably, and all citizens are protected from discrimination and exploitation.

Here, justice serves as a foundation for creating a fair and inclusive society.

Justice, in its essence refers to the equitable distribution of resources, opportunities, and rights, ensuring that all individuals receive what they are due under the law. It builds a system where fairness prevails, and each person's rights are respected and protected.

Conversely, charity is a voluntary act of providing aid to those in need. While charity provides critical short-term relief, it does not address the underlying causes of these problems. In a society that prioritizes justice systematic inequalities are automatically reduced, leading to fewer situations where people are left in dire need. As a result, the reliance on charity diminishes because justice creates a more balanced and fair society where the need for temporary aid is greatly reduced.

Therefore, a society that upholds justice effectively creates systems that reduce inequalities, lessening the dependence on charity to address social issues.

One of the fundamental ways in which justice serves as a foundation for equality is through fair distribution of resources. Justice ensures that resources are allocated across all segments of society, primarily through progressive taxation and robust welfare systems. Progressive taxation involves higher income earners paying a larger percentage of their earnings in taxes, which is then used to fund public services such as education, healthcare, and social security. For example, Sweden, known for its comprehensive welfare state and progressive tax system, consistently ranks among the top for social equality and low poverty rates. Reduction in the economic disparities, decreases the need for charitable interventions. In this way, justice, through fair distribution of resources, creates a more balanced and equitable society where the need for charity significantly diminishes.
