Essay

Imagine waking up one morning to discover that your voice, once a powerful tool in shaping your country's future, now holds no real weight in governance. Elections, once a vibrant exercise of civic duty, have become mere formalities. The decisions that affect your daily life are made not by elected representatives but by a distant and unaccountable elite. This scenario is not just a dystopian fantasy - it is a potential reality if the principles of democracy continue to erode. In the heart of every democratic society lies an enduring hope. In the contemporary era, as nations grapple with complexities, Democracy has become a necessity, as it promises an aspiring future. The hopes for Democracy in Pakistan center on the strengthening of democratic institutions, fostering political stability and inclusivity, and enhancing national unity and global standing. However, these hopes are impeded by challenges such as delayed constitution making, political engineering, authoritarian military regimes, and electoral malpractices, which are compounded by external geopolitical pressures and pervasive illiteracy.
