

Competition in Education

in every sphere of life

There should be competition in every department of life. Because competition brings forth desired results. Undeniably, competition in education is necessary. When there is no competition, people become complacent and lose their untapped potential. Competition should not be only confined to students, but also it should be promoted amongst education institutions. When educational institutes compete, they bring about quality education to students. They equip their students with creativity and criticality. Hence, competition yields positive results.

Nowadays, government educational institutions are earning bad repute in the society owing to their below-the-standards education. Undoubtedly, element of competition does not find any resonance with them. Though competition does not exist among public institutions, some of them are having outstanding performances. Educational structure should be managed in a way that public institutes compete with privately-managed institutes. Efforts should be made to sort out why privately-managed educational institutions are better than that of public ones. Quality of education is something which must be prime focus of educational institutions. To ensure this, competition

Another factor that discourages competition between public and private educational institutions is medium of communication. Privately-managed institutions such as Beacon House, City Grammar School and various others use English as a medium of communication. Whereas medium of communication in government educational institutions is Urdu. This creates segregation in ^{the} society. It is actually against the essence of integration. Similarly, it also furthers rich-poor divide in ^{the} society. As the private education institutions extort hefty fees which is beyond the reach of the poor. Hence in these institutions only privileged few are taught. Education should be provided in the same medium across the board so that people feel equal to one another.

To take bird's eye view, competition usually yields positive results. It should be promoted in every sphere of life. Particularly, in educational institutions and their pupils, it must have preference. This way, they improve and upgrade themselves. Quality of education cannot be achieved on its own, it requires a lot of homework. Impetus for homework in this regard is ~~p~~ come by competition.
