Dealing with Children

The author differ from modern educationist in that they emphasise not to engage with children. To him, children response positively with instructions if they are cared unconditionally with love. Children will not like that they are treated for personal or political gains .So teachers can groom children well by understanding their psychology and by empathising with them. However, overworked teachers can hardly develop any affiliation with the students. Furthermore, a friendly atmosphere could prove annoying in the company of in children which may lead to infuriating teachers. The author concludes that there should be predetermined rules to treat children under any circumstances but the bond of mutual harmony based on emotions and understanding between teacher and student is more advisable than strictness.
