

Self-conceit may lead to self-destruction

There is no doubt that self-conceit is misleading and self-destructive. It makes its carrier self-complacent and hence he loses the ability to self-reflect and introspect in himself. People with self-conceit are overconfident and thus they overestimate their potential. There are multiple reasons why people become self-conceited. One of them is losing sight of the society. When one believes himself and boasts his capabilities supreme to the society, he simply courts self-destruction. There is no one outside which can destroy one unless one is taking st overestimating his powers. However, one can overcome this negative of life, if one strives for doing so.

Self-conceit is the result of overconfidence. Usually, the roots of overconfidence are seen in such environments where people intentionally praise others. They don't do so honestly. They do so out of some interests. good try to explain through examples Similarly, sometimes adopting isolation also causes overestimation of one's abilities. When one is not taking stock of social transformation, he can easily become overconfident. In these circumstances, one hardly bears in oneself room for improvement. Consequently, he becomes myopic and shortsighted. No reflection on one's shortcomings dearly costs such people Hence, overconfidence on one's abilities is quite dangerous for one's self-improvement.

Obviously, it can be overcome. If one stops being arrogant of one's abilities and capabilities, one can triumph over self-conceit. Adopting humility is a straight way-forward. Being human, it is not possible that one would be impeccably infallible. In this perspective, keeping one's door open for others' recommendations, helps one improve a lot. Moreover, one should never be shy of introspecting and self-reflection. When one self-introspects, one finds one's ^{own} shortcomings and tries to rectify and address them. Otherwise, how it is possible to own one's faults and rectify them. Though it is challenging to accept and own one's errors happily, it is necessary for self-improvement. Therefore, self-reflection and self-introspection is efficacious antidote for self-conceit.

Overall, self-conceit has its own origin to origin to overconfidence. Mainly, such people fall prey to it who have no room for questioning themselves. Hence, they never find their faults and shortcomings and live in illusion of self-perfection. Thus, to save oneself from this ill, it is necessary to question oneself and one's approaches towards life.