

Yesterday, Sir Adil Riaz said that you must practice writing something in English on daily basis. The main reason behind this was that it will improve your English and writing skills.

Since then, I was thinking about what to write. So, I thought that why shouldn't I start ~~these writings~~ this with the start of my journey writing about my journey towards CSS?

Back in 2nd year of my FSC, when one of our teacher was asking about our goals, ~~one~~ a girl raised her hand and said, "I'll do CSS." For the first time, I listened this word. I went back to my home, I searched about this word and finally I came to know that what the CSS is. But, that was not the time, I decided about doing it.

After getting admission in University, my elder brother told me that I should go for CSS. I didn't take that serious. But, I followed some pages on social media, which were about CSS. Slowly, the nerves in my mind forced me to think about this. The turning point came when I ~~to~~ ~~met~~ met my dearest Sir teacher, Sir Javed Riaz, in hospital after birth of his first son. He said, "You must go for CSS as I think you are capable enough to crack it. It's my wish that there should be someone in bearueraay who is mine?" These lines ^{from} him ~~to~~ motivated me enough to the point that my inner self said,

"Fahad, you must go for CSS and you have to crack it."

satisfactory

yes you should go for css but better to rewrite the news article rather than writing directionless and useless passages
