

Attitude Towards Children

According to the author, favour

educational theorists favour not to interfere with children and few favours to enjoy their company. If one likes children, they will obey and accept restrictions but without being irritated. It is useless to regard them as a field for valuable social endeavour and as an outlet for power-impulses. No children will be treated as a vote bank for one's party or a body to be sacrificed to king and country. The presence of children gives pleasurable moment. Teachers will rarely interfere with children's freedom when it is necessary. It is impossible for over-worked teachers to feel towards them.

The

author does not think that one can carry education as a whole profession. The youngster's society is troublesome when laws are violated. Fatigue produces irritation. Friendship cannot be preserved by only self-control. No rules are substitute for affection and tact.

Idea is ok. Too long. Mistakes identified.
