

Portrait of Manto.

Manto was a social outcast. He was criticized and taken to court over the offensive nature of his writing. That did not stop him from painting a realistic picture of society by writing about the life experiences of the downtrodden. To him, human nature was neither black nor white, but grey. Through his working-class characters, the readers felt their own issues represented. He was a realist and had an unbiased view of the human nature.

Every nation's education system is in harmony with their national character and gives shape to their collective goals and ambitions. And the people are always in pursuit of these goals. Therefore, a nation's education system is that all-encompassing system of upbringing through which, people reach intellectual potential and build their moral values and character. The education system trains the people in such a way that they are able to make history.
